Thomas' Takeaways

Thankful For...Conflict

Yep, conflict. Yep, that's what I wrote.

Conflict to many people might as well be a four-letter word. Personality profiles have categories about conflict avoiders (as well as seekers, which is equally unhealthy). Christians are called peace, so why should we embrace conflict? The answer is because we're called to be peacemakers, not peacekeepers.

Let me clarify-there is a difference between healthy and unhealthy conflict. Unhealthy conflict is what should be avoided-unneded anger, violence, or attacks that do nothing but tear down or intimidate. But there IS such a thing as healthy conflict-and healthy conflict, healthy in action, goal, and method, I'll offer, shouldn't just not be avoided, but should be encouraged.

In a marriage, both spouses have a say into most of the decisions. When they disagree, that's conflict. But, when conflict is dealt with healthily, options are considered by both that wouldn't have been, possibilities are brought up by the joint effort, and a final decision is reached that ideally is better than if only one of them had made it, not to mention that through the involvement both people invest in the decision. You see, healthy conflict increases the quality, process, commitment and trust of the people involved in ways that avoiding can never do.

Imagine now someone has done something wrong. Peacekeeping keeps everyone happy by not dealing with it. Peacemaking, however, seeks out the problem to deal with it in the most beneficial way. In a sense, when we avoid issues with each other and only keep the peace, we're keeping ourselves from the better selves we could be by addressing the issue. Healthy conflict grows people and helps them be accountable.

I'm grateful that God and Jesus were active peacemakers in the conflict of man and sin, that they were willing to deal with the issues head on instead of avoiding them. So yes, I am thankful for conflict in the sense that through healthy conflict, I am made better, more complete and held to a better standard both from God's efforts, as well as my fellow Christian's. Grace to you.

First, I want to thank God this week. I am feeling better than I have in a long time, it seems my stomach problems are fading. Thank you for all your prayers!

Second, I want to thank Lindsay House for planning a great Halloween Party! We had about 15 students (pretty good for midterm season). There was great food provided by Darla Long and Many others and fun games provided by Lindsay. Finally, one of the new guys at the party came to Tuesday Night Devo and it looks like he may join us permanently. Great success!
